

Problem Statement: Some college students may not be confident in their cooking abilities, or simply living off of pop-tarts and ramen. Our idea is to bring students together, and allow them to connect with other students who know how to cook.

Who is experiencing the problem: College students and other young adults who want to learn to cook or who want to share their cooking experience with others.

What is the problem: College students and other young adults do not know how to cook and have trouble finding people with similar cooking experiences nor have a consistent way of getting food that is sustainable and affordable.

Where does the problem present itself: Many college students, especially those who live off-campus deal with the issue of not being able to find a stable source of food, and therefore must cook for themselves. But since they are living on their own for the first time, they likely do not know how to cook.

Why does it matter: Many college students are forced to eat off of an expensive meal plan, constantly go out to eat, or cook up some inedible garbage. So finding people that are willing to help them not only helps them learn how to cook, but allows them to meet new people.